Hebrew Words for Grace

The concept of grace in the Hebrew language is represented by several distinct words, each carrying unique shades of meaning that contribute to a fuller understanding of grace in its original context. The primary Hebrew terms often translated as grace include "chen" (חֵן), "chesed" (חֶסֶד), and sometimes "rachamim" (רַחֲמִים), among others.

Chen (חֵן)

Chen is the most direct Hebrew equivalent for the English word grace and generally means "favor," "grace," or "beauty." It is frequently used in the Hebrew Bible to describe the gracious favor granted by God to individuals or groups. Chen implies an unearned, gracious acceptance or approval, often highlighting the recipient's undeservedness of such kindness.

Chesed (חסד)

Chesed is another fundamental term related to grace but with a broader and deeper meaning. It is often translated as "lovingkindness," "mercy," or "steadfast love." Chesed reflects a covenantal loyalty and enduring love that God shows towards His people. This word embodies a faithful, compassionate, and generous kindness that is a central attribute of God's character in the Hebrew Bible.

Rachamim (רחמים)

Rachamim, derived from the root word meaning "womb," conveys compassion and tender mercy. While not always directly translated as grace, it is closely related to the concept by emphasizing God's empathetic and merciful disposition toward humankind.

Grace in the Hebrew Bible

The Hebrew Bible, or Tanakh, provides numerous examples where the meaning of grace in Hebrew language is vividly illustrated. The term "chen" appears in various narratives to describe God's favor, while "chesed" is frequently used to express His covenantal love and mercy.

Examples of Chen in Scripture

One prominent example of chen is found in the story of Noah in Genesis 6:8, where it states, "But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord." Here, grace signifies divine favor granted to Noah despite widespread human wickedness.

Chesed's Role in Divine Relationship

Chesed is pervasive throughout the Psalms and the prophetic books, often describing God's unfailing love and faithfulness. For instance, Psalm 136 repeatedly emphasizes God's chesed, declaring, "His steadfast love endures forever." This underscores grace as an ongoing, reliable, and enduring aspect of God's nature.

Grace in Human Interactions

The Hebrew Bible also depicts grace in the context of interpersonal relationships, where showing chen or chesed to others is a moral imperative. Acts of kindness, mercy, and loyalty are highly valued, mirroring the divine grace that humans receive.
